With the growing awareness of the necessity for continuing professional education, many congregations and church bodies now offer ministers sabbatical time and financial aid to encourage clinical pastoral training. Several theological colleges recommend clinical training as an integral part of theological education and theological students should apply for financial aid through their college or denominational headquarters. When bursaries from the above sources are not available, this Institute will consider a limited number of bursary applications.

Clinical Pastoral Education for Theological Students and Parish Clergy

Courses for 1966-67 through
THE DIVISION OF UNIVERSITY EXTENSION
UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

The Toronto Institute for Pastoral Training was founded in 1957 to provide closely supervised field education in pastoral care for theological students and continuing professional education for parish and institutional clergy of all churches. A committee of Direction guides its activities and courses are offered through the Division of University Extension, University of Toronto.

The Institute is affiliated with six theological schools in the Toronto area, all of which give academic credit for successfully completed courses under the Institute. By special arrangement students of the Toronto Graduate School of Theological Studies may enrol in clinical pastoral training as part of the prerequisite for advanced degrees.

The curriculum approximates that recommended by the American Association of Theological Schools, the Council for Clinical Training, New York, and the Institute of Pastoral Care, Boston. The teaching staff are clergymen with experience in parish ministry, institutional chaplaincy, and supervision of clinical pastoral education.

Courses are designed to provide theological students, clergy and religious workers with an opportunity to deepen their understanding of pastoral care and to develop greater skill and sensitivity in ministering to the people in their community. Through the resultant strengthening of religious leadership clergy will be better equipped to function pastorally and to prepare laity for responsible Christian service.

Included are supervised pastoral calls, group life sessions, clinical seminars, individual supervision and theoretical study in the social sciences and pastoral care. Authorities in several disciplines allied with the ministry regularly contribute through lectures, group discussions, demonstrations, and personal consultation.
